Course Summary: This course aims to trace a path through the history of late modern philosophy, from Kant's Critique of Pure Reason (1781/1787) through Hegel's Phenomenology of Spirit (1807) and Marx's Economic and Philosophic Manuscripts of 1844, to Sartre's Being and Nothingness (1943), de Beauvoir's The Second Sex (1949) and Fanon's Black Skin, White Masks (1952). The central theme of the course is the tension between recognition and alienation. Starting with a criticism of Kant's theory of knowledge, Hegel sets out to understand what knowledge is in a way that allows us to understand ourselves as knowers. To do so, he places self-consciousness at the centre of our understanding. However, he holds that there can be no self-consciousness without recognition by another self-consciousness; self-consciousness is essentially interpersonal and mutual. This gives rise to a struggle for recognition and opens up space for many ways of falling short – various forms of alienation and bad faith. Yet the full extent of such alienation only becomes apparent in the struggle for recognition in the context of gender and race. Our aim in the course is to study various conceptions of the struggle for recognition and examine the many forms of alienation that, in the course of this struggle, self-consciousness can fall victim to.

Course Structure: There are weekly pre-recorded lectures and other online content equivalent to 2-hours of an in-person seminar, as well as a weekly one-hour online or possibly in-person tutorial. The pre-recorded materials will provide some explanation and analysis of the readings for each week. The tutorials afford the opportunity for philosophical discussion and engagement. Philosophical learning is very much a matter of engaging and thinking together with others, rather than the achievement of a state of possessing information. This is why it is extremely important that you read through the assigned texts and view the pre-recorded materials in advance so as to be prepared to actively take part in discussion.

Information about class timing and format will be on the LEARN page for the course.

Assessment: There are three pieces of assessment for this course:

- Mid-term essay (approx. 1500 words) (40%): Due Thurs. 22nd Oct. 2020, 12pm
- Final essay (approx. 2500 words) (55%): Due Thurs. 10th Dec. 2020, by 12pm
- Participation (5%)

The Mid-term essay will require an explanation of a central idea from Hegel. The Final essay will require an explanation of, and critical engagement with, a central idea from one of the later authors. Questions and guidance for each essay will be posted at least 4 weeks before the deadline on Learn. The assessment of participation will be based on presence and engagement in tutorial and in office hours.

Main Texts

I'll post detailed suggestions about further readings and resources as we go along. These are the main texts that we will be studying:

- Kant's Critique of Pure Reason

There are two main translations of the First Critique: The classic one by Norman Kemp Smith, and the standard scholarly one by Paul Guyer and Allen Wood. Either of these translations would be fine. Another option, available online, is the simplified and annotated text by Jonathan Bennett:

<http://www.earlymoderntexts.com/authors/kant>

- Hegel's Phenomenology of Spirit

The standard translation in English is by A.V. Miller. However, we will work from a translation by Terry Pinkard that juxtaposes the English and German text and is available online:

<https://www.marxists.org/reference/archive/hegel/works/ph/pinkard-translation-of-phenomenology.pdf>

- Marx's Economic and Philosophic Manuscripts of 1844

The standard translation in English is by Martin Milligan and is included in The Marx-Engels Reader (2nd ed.), edited by Robert Tucker. An online version is available here:

A pdf of The Marx-Engels Reader is available online.

- Sartre's Being and Nothingness

A new English translation by Sarah Richmond was published in 2018 and supersedes Hazel Barnes's translation from 1957. I would urge you to purchase Richmond's translation. A pdf of the old translation is available online.

- De Beauvoir's The Second Sex

A new English translation by Constance Borde and Sheila Malovany-Chevallier was published in 2010 and supersedes H.M. Parshley's poor translation from 1953. (Under pressure from the publisher Alfred Knopf, Parshley abridged the book by about 80 pages!). Please use the new translation. A pdf of it is available online.

- Fanon's Black Skin, White Masks

A new English edition of the book will be issued in March 2021. Unfortunately, it will not come out in time for our course. The currently standard translation is by Richard Philcox from 2007. A pdf of an older translation by Charles Lam Markmann is available through discoverED and online.

Schedule of Readings

I will make suggestions to focus on specific selections or passages as we go along.

Week 1: Kant's Critical Philosophy

In formulating his Critical Philosophy, Kant asks how knowledge of the world is possible. To answer the question, he argues that rather than our experience depending on the knowable world, the knowable world depends on our experience. In this week, we will acquire a brief overview of Kant's project in the First Critique.

Reading: Critique of Pure Reason, Preface to the Second Edition; Introduction

Week 2: The project of Hegel's Phenomenology of Spirit

Hegel expresses dissatisfaction with Kant's epistemology. He seeks to understand what knowledge is in a way that allows us to understand ourselves as knowers. To do so, he embarks on the project of phenomenology. In this week, we will seek to understand what phenomenology is, how it is related to Hegel's dialectical method, and what Hegel finds dissatisfactory in Kant's philosophy.

Reading: Phenomenology of Spirit, Introduction §73-§89

Please note: This is hard reading. Push through; better to have looked at it and failed to understand much than not to have looked at it at all.

Week 3: Hegel on Self-Consciousness and Lordship and Bondage

The key to phenomenology is self-consciousness. However, self-consciousness requires recognition by another self-consciousness. This gives rise to a struggle for recognition. One stage of this struggle is Lordship and Bondage. This is a form of personal encounter that has inspired a great deal of 19th and 20th Century philosophy, social theory and politics – including the authors we will read later in the term. It is, arguably, the most famous passage from The Phenomenology of Spirit. In this week, we will seek to understand why self-consciousness stands in need of recognition, how the struggle for recognition unfolds, and how it gives rise to Lordship and Bondage.

Reading: Phenomenology of Spirit, Self-Consciousness §166-§196

Please note: This is very hard reading! Please make sure to give yourself ample time to read through the text. Try to make it through, even if it seems elusive.

Week 4: Hegel on Spirit

The progression of the Hegelian dialectic is well exemplified in Hegel's discussion of Spirit. Here we encounter the tension between laws of family and laws of state (Think: Antigone), and a discussion of gender roles. We will study the relation between self-consciousness and spirit, how spirit sees its relation to law, and how this gives rise to gender roles. We will also begin discussing how to write the Mid-term essay.

Reading: Phenomenology of Spirit, Self-Consciousness §437-§462

Please note: This is even harder reading! Please try to make it through, even if it seems extremely elusive.

Week 5: Marx on Estranged Labour

Marx thinks that capitalism gives rise to real lordship and bondage, and, in consequence, various forms of alienation. In this week, we will examine Marx's line of thought and the forms of alienation, and we will seek to relate this to Hegel's discussion of self-consciousness. Finally, we will continue discussion of how to write the Mid-term essay.

Reading: Economic and Philosophical Manuscripts of 1844, Estranged Labour (pp. 70-81 in The Marx-Engels Reader)

Week 6: Sartre on Self-Consciousness and Bad Faith

In formulating a leading version of existentialism, Sartre offers his own account of self-consciousness as nothing other than freedom. He then puts forward a phenomenological account of various ways in which we can misconstrue our freedom, and, in doing so, succumb to bad faith. In this week, we will study Sartre's theory of self-consciousness as freedom and examine the various kinds of bad faith.

Reading: Sartre, Being and Nothingness, Part One, Chapter One: "The Origin of Negation," §II and §V (pp. 37-44, pp.57-86); Part One, Chapter Two: "Bad Faith," §1 and §2 (pp. 87-113)

Week 7: Sartre on Interpersonal Self-Consciousness

For Sartre as for Hegel, our self-consciousness essentially depends upon another self-consciousness. Sartre thinks that we know another self-consciousness as immediately as we know our own and that the other's self-consciousness shapes and determines ours. This, however, provides the occasion for various kinds of objectification and alienation. In this week, we will study Sartre's account of interpersonal self-consciousness.

Reading: Sartre, Being and Nothingness, Part Three, Chapter One: "The Existence of Others," §I and §V (pp. 307-309, pp. 347-408)

Week 8: Sartre on Freedom

The key to Sartre's thought, and to existentialism in general, is the notion of freedom: We are, first and foremost, free. However, our freedom is always in situation, and we misconstrue it if we disregard factual aspects of our being—our facticity. Yet can freedom and facticity be reconciled? How are we to understand limitations on freedom? In this week, we will consider whether, at the heart of Sartre's system, there lies incoherence.

Reading: Sartre, Being and Nothingness, Part Four, Chapter One: "Being and Doing: Freedom," §I (pp. 569-628)

Week 9: Simone de Beauvoir – Existentialist

Kant, Hegel, Marx, Sartre – and many others – have an enormous blind spot. As white men, they write from a position of power and privilege. De Beauvoir formulates her own version of existentialism, grounded in an account of the experience of women, which affords her a different view of 'facticity'. She redeploys the Hegelian theme of Lordship and Bondage in the context of gender, and she argues that, up to this point in history, the being of a woman has always been alienated. In this week, we will study de Beauvoir's project, consider its philosophical ambition, and examine, as a case study, her account of the woman in love who struggles for recognition.

Reading: De Beauvoir, The Second Sex, Introduction; Chapter 12: The Woman in Love

Week 10: De Beauvoir: Liberation and its Obstacles

Despite her grim depiction of woman's condition, de Beauvoir remains optimistic about the possibility of liberation. In this week, we will study the struggles that woman faces on the path to liberation and de Beauvoir's vision of what such liberation would look like.

Reading: De Beauvoir, The Second Sex, Chapter 14: The Independent Woman; Conclusion

Week 11: Fanon on the Lived Experience of Blackness

Another profound blind spot in the tradition from Kant and Hegel onwards is race. Fanon articulates in existentialist terms the experience of being a black man. However, he also criticizes Sartre for what, in effect, amounts to a betrayal. In this week, we will study Fanon's phenomenological reflections together with his critique of Sartre.

Reading: Fanon, Black Skin, White Masks, Chapter 5: The Lived Experience of the Black Man; Conclusion

Learning Outcomes

On completion of this course, you will be able to:

1. Demonstrate core skills in philosophy, including interpreting and critically engaging with philosophical texts, evaluating arguments and theories, and developing your own ideas in response to the issues discussed.
2. Articulate and defend your own views regarding the topics and theories covered by the module.
3. Compare and contrast the concepts and theoretical frameworks covered by the course with those used in other areas of philosophy.
4. Demonstrate understanding of key figures and texts from late modern philosophy.
