

Don't assume that you can copy or use material for teaching or research without getting copyright permission, just because your use is educational or non-commercial.

You can legally use copyright protected material if:

- You have permission from the rights holder
You or the university owns the rights
Licences and permissions - CLA, ERA, NLA, PRS for Music etc
Employers own the rights in material created by their employees under UK law unless an employment contract states otherwise
You are relying on a legal defence
Exceptions and fair dealing
Copyright has expired
Duration of copyright

Table with 2 columns: Type of work, Duration of copyright protection. Rows include: Written, dramatic, musical and artistic works; Sound and music recording; Films; Broadcasts; Layout of published editions of written, dramatic or musical works; Crown copyright.

Copyright exceptions and Fair Dealing

In a limited number of situations it is possible to use copyright protected works without permission. Some of these exceptions could apply to higher education presuming that there are no CLA and ERA licences. They will only apply in limited circumstances and are subject to a test of fairness.

The concept of fair dealing – similar with fair use in the US but more specific and restrictive in the UK – is a very important tool for education and research.

Copyright exceptions as specified in Copyright, Designs and Patents Act 1988:

- 1. Quotation & Criticism and Review
2. Text & Data Mining (TDM)
3. Parody & Pastiche
4. Research & Private Study
5. Disability
6. Archives & Preservation
7. News Reporting
8. Education
9. Orphan works
10. Private Copying
11. Libraries
12. Museums & Galleries

USING COPYRIGHT PROTECTED WORKS FOR EDUCATION AND RESEARCH

Scholarly Communications
openaccess@ed.ac.uk

This material is for general information only and is not intended to provide legal advice. For further information please contact: copyright@ed.ac.uk

This poster created by Eugen Stoica & Stephanie (Charlie) Farley, design by Nicola Greenhorn, The University of Edinburgh, 2018, is licensed CC BY-SA